They are generally the best kind of people. Sometimes they are childless couples who know that they will never have any children of their own, but who do not want to be deprived of the joy of owning and raising the little ones. Sometimes they are old people who have raised families, but whose children have all gone to homes of their own. They miss the prattle of little voices and the patter of little footsteps, and feel lonely without them.

"What kind of people are they who are willing to give up their children?"

"Not the best kind of people by any means. Sometimes the parents are dead, or the father is dranken and worthless and the mother can not support her little ones. Sometimes both parents are unworthy, and the courts take the children from them and turn them over to us; but there are always turn them over to us; but there are always homes for them if they have no physical or mental defects. People do not adopt children who have any physical deformity."

The Foundlings home makes no effort to advertise the fact that the babies it cares for "It seems to be a wise dispensation of Providence," said Mrs. Spangler, "that there are so many people ready and willing to receive these little ones to their hearts."

Are the fact that the babies it cares, are to be given out for adoption, yet it seldom that a baby exceeding the age of months is allowed to remain in the institution. There are many people who prefer turn of the little ones by the foster parents, who in the meantime have learned to love the children as their own. We don't particularly care to give the little waifs to the rich, but insist that the people who adopt them must be able to properly take care of them and give them a Christian education and bringing up. People of the middle class in comfortable circumstances make the best foster parents."
